On March 6, 2009, Extensions, Inc. (the “Company”) announced the launch of its EXT Social Network at www.EXT.com (“EXT”). In connection with the launch of EXT, the Company issued the following press release:

Extensions, Inc. Announces the Launch of www.EXT.com the Next Generation of Social Networking.

Unlock the wisdom trapped within social networks and transform your Social Networking experiences from a novelty to a productivity tool.

Houston, Texas, March 6, 2009 -- Extensions, Inc. (OTC: EXTI) today announced that it has launched its EXT Social Network at www.EXT.com. EXT outfits users with all the tools they need to create their own micro-social network. Users are able to host multiple profiles, control content visibility, embed items with a single-click, and unite with others in a way that increases effectiveness and collaboration. We believe our toolset unlocks the power of social networking as a utility, instead of being simply a novelty.

There is no limit on the amount of profiles, groups, pages, or pods (EXT’s term for the user-selected cells of information) a user can have, and permission and visibility controls are strong. Users are given the ability to choose who can and cannot view, and in some cases even comment on, the content they choose to add. Information will only be shared with the individuals who are hand-picked by the user. Those who are not granted access to particular information will not even know that it exists.

This allows for a more focused and directed type of social networking. Users can easily gather around certain causes, and by keeping permission controls tight, increase the amount of interaction and communication occurring between members. We believe these micro-social networks give users access to the knowledge and experience trapped in traditional social networks, and has the potential of allowing user the ability of leveraging this knowledge to solve complex problems.
