LinkIO seems to target a larger population by doing something similar to what Uber did (to allow none professional to cover an existing demand). LinkIO lets regular people work on small projects at a lower cost (by bringing more service providers to the equation) while allowing companies and professionals to coexist on the same platform. I believe that this is clever and can very well change the way we get Linkio isn't just a "venture" to us. It's personal. Our family emigrated from Cuba 16 years ago, and our dad became a house painter to sustain our family.

Finding new clients was always difficult for him, and money was tight. So we started searching for apps to help him secure new gigs. Nothing seemed to fit, and that's when the idea for Linkio was born.

As we started the development process, it became clear that Linkio was much more than just a home improvement app. In just the first three months of the platform going live, our dad made over $1,500 from jobs not even related to painting! It was an unprecedented source of income for him, and the possibilities were huge.

DEVELOPING LINKIO: THE EARLY STAGES

Developing Linkio was a journey in trial, error, and user experience. But eventually, we landed on a design that resonated with our target audience. Clean, streamlined, and easy to use.
