Norilsk Nickel and the Russian Academy of Sciences launch research for breakthrough environmental technologies

MMC Norilsk Nickel initiated discussion of Environmental Issues in Norilsk Industrial Region and Possible Solutions at the meeting of the Russian Academy of Sciences Presidium. Member of the Academy Leopold Leontiev and Professor Andrey Tarassov delivered reports on the issue.

MMC Norilsk Nickel General Director Mikhail Prokhorov and Deputy General Director for Environment Jokves Rozenberg took part in the discussion. Meeting participants emphasized the complex nature of environmental issues underpinned by specific features of raw materials, geography of Norilsk, lack of railroad communications and lack of opportunities for local use of sulphur dioxide utilization products including sulphuric acid and free sulphur.

Presidium of the Russian Academy of Sciences pointed out that despite current investment intensive and costly measures, sulphur dioxide output remains at a relatively high level. It was emphasized that existing technologies and sulphur materials processing flow sheets used in Norilsk are incapable of ensuring the use environmentally and economically agreeable solutions to the problem, which poses the challenge of search for breakthrough technologies. For this reason taking into account the high importance of Norilsk Nickel's operations in the Russian economy Presidium of the Russian Academy of Sciences resolved on developing a research and technical program in 2006 to address the need for environmentally, economically and socially balanced gradual reduction of sulphur dioxide emissions to acceptable safe levels. A special commission will be set up and tasked with development of the program.
