Dear Ms. Murphy:

Anything that affects the large corporations of our country will also affect the smaller businesses and the public that they serve. The governance at the boardroom level is essential to their success and does not need to be interfered with at this time. The proposed shareholder proxy access rule change will only lead to internal issues for corporations, and it should not be passed.

Business in our area has not been very good since the recent economic downturn. All over America, people have to cut back on the goods and services they would normally use. My company, Crespin's Cleaning Inc., has definitely felt the impact of this crisis. During the past six years we have been steadily busy, but this year we have seen a decline in the amount people are willing to spend on cleaning services. My three employees and I are managing to stay afloat so far, but this could change should large corporations be forced to deal with internal election issues. The more their attention is drawn from their everyday business, the worse their companies will fare. If this leads to increased prices for the people of our country, we can count on losing business that we desperately need, as our customers will not be able to afford our services.

As a small business owner, I can tell you that it has not been easy. We need to be able to count on the stability of large corporations, because they affect every aspect of commerce. Now more than ever, we need to make sure that these large businesses stay profitable so that we may stay prosperous as well. Clearly, I do not want to see the shareholder proxy access rule change passed.

Respectfully,

Kristina Crespin
