Dear Ms. Murphey,

WM Imaging Solutions is in the business of sales and servicing many different automated office products. Clearly, it depends on a strong economy for my company to flourish. It is hard enough with the automotive and banking industries putting so many folks out of a job, but recently I have heard of this proposed shareholder proxy access rule change. In my opinion, this rule change is a train crash waiting to happen.

Given our nation's current fiscal struggles, many companies have had to shut their doors. We have really been encountering a business slowdown. At one point, I had seven employees working for me. Because of this economy, I have had to come down to just five. If this shareholder proxy access rule is changed, it is conceivable that the wrong people will be put into positions of power on the boards of publicly traded companies. Some of those companies are clients or potential clients of mine, so if they lose money or go under, I could lose a client. This will eventually hurt all businesses, large and small.

Our country is struggling enough to try to come out of this recession with as few lasting damages as possible. In large part, we have made some great strides. But so much more needs to be done to ensure that we do not see another financial meltdown like this ever again. If the shareholder proxy access rule change is passed, you can pretty much assume many folks are going to continue to take it on the proverbial chin. For this reason, it is imperative that you not pass this particular rule change. No one needs the heartache that this change will almost assuredly bring.

Thank you,

Boyd Doll
