Dear Ms. Murphy,

Shareholders already have the ability to nominate directors for election and have been very successful in doing so. There is no need for the government to increase its presence when it concerns publicly traded companies or any other business. The Securities and Exchange Commission has not taken into consideration that this proposal for shareholder proxy access rule changes could lead to a higher cost for products and services that smaller business owners need. Clearly, I am not in favor of the proposed changes by the SEC.

My business partner and I have two companies within eight miles of each other, and given the current condition of our economy, they are both doing very well. However, just two miles down the road a steel mill let go over one hundred people not long ago, and now they are going to be closing their doors for good. That facility has housed some sort of business for over one hundred years. The SEC's proposed rule changes may result in increased cost for the equipment and services I need to operate my business, so we may also have to cut back by decreasing our staff. We have been in business for close to twenty years, and I would hate to see these changes made.

Our fitness centers provide a simple IRA plan for our employees and ourselves. There is always a risk being in the market, especially considering the overall poor condition of our economy today. One of my biggest concerns is the fact that any business could possibly be overseen by someone who has little knowledge of the business that they are making decisions for. Our businesses will be much better off if the government does not interfere.

Regards,

Shaun Fisher
