Dear Madam,

My business creates handmade clothing for renaissance fairs. The costumes I make are replicas of Renaissance period clothing. It is a very interesting and very different type of business to be involved in. The people that work at renaissance fairs are easily the most diverse, interesting and, lovingly, probably the strangest people in the world. My business' success, as well as others who work at the renaissance fairs, depend upon paying patrons coming and purchasing our goods and services. The economic downturn over the last few years has made this difficult, as people are trying to save their money and avoid luxury costs such as attending our fairs.

Now that the economy and business is finally beginning to look better, changes are being proposed to shareholder proxy access which will cause harm to our economy. The government appointing special interests into corporate offices will assert more government control over our corporate world. If economic improvement is what this government truly desires, these rule changes certainly send the wrong message. Economic damage is the only possible outcome of making the proposed changes to shareholder proxy access. My business thrives on luxury spending by the American populous, and these changes will leave me and my business as one of the many who will be harmed.

Please ensure the proposed changes to shareholder proxy access are not allowed to happen. The economy is seeing some well deserved improvement only recently, and it hangs by only a thread. Changing these rules and allowing government overspending and overbearing to overtake our economy and corporate industries will only damage America and its citizens' ability to achieve financial stability again.

Sincerely,

Nicolette De Los Santos
