Dear Madam,

My internet-based company, PWJ Co, helps websites increase their traffic by improving and updating the content they have available to their viewers. There are many companies like mine all around the world, and the services are becoming more and more competitive. To remain competitive and continue being profitable, I need to be able to keep low overhead costs and use the American advertising system to its full potential. If there are government appointed chairmen or special interests involved in governing the corporate rules of web business, operating costs or the ability to remain competitive may become more difficult. A person who is not experienced in this field should not be making decisions for the entire industry. A change to the shareholder proxy access rule will allow things like that to take happen.

Since web business does not operate based upon the local community's economy, I have fared better than most through the recent economic lows. That is not to say however, that I have not seen it begin to slow. My sales and advertising revenue have dropped about 15% across the board over the last year. Shareholder proxy access changes could increase these losses and possibly increase the nation's economic problems. Many of the websites I operate on are publicly traded companies. Their share values decreasing because of some government appointed special interest making decisions will create more problems than anyone realizes. As these companies' revenue dwindles, so will the money they can invest in advertising and web content. When this happens, it will mean fewer contracts I can secure, and less income I can obtain.

The rules for shareholder proxy access should remain unchanged. These proposed changes will cause only harm to America. Our economy cannot afford special interests and government interference in the corporate world. Please keep American business owners and the American economy in mind, and stop the proposed changes to the shareholder proxy access rules.

Sincerely,

Jesse J. Futch Sr.
