Dear Ms. Murphy;

More than once over the past several years, the Securities and Exchange Commission has tried to change the way shareholder proxy access is handled. Not only could this change directly undermine state level laws and regulations, it could also have devastating and far reaching effects on small business owners like me. Even though my business has become a very part-time business over the past five years, I still have regular customers who depend on me for regular orders, and I do not want to disappoint them in any way.

My business, Flutterby Kissed Unique Treasures, was established in 2002 and was a full-time business for me through 2004. Because I had found a very reliable supplier for my metaphysical healing stones coupled with being able to fill a niche, I stayed quite busy throughout those two years. Actually, I attribute that to the stability of the company that I bought my supplies from. Because they were able to maintain consistency and quality in the products that I purchased from them, not to mention the pricing, I was able to pass all of that onto my customers. Seven years later, I still have a few regular customers who depend on the products that they purchase from me.

Even though I am only one small business, I need to look at the bigger picture, and changing the current shareholder proxy access rules could potentially harm larger businesses, as well as my customers. The idea that someone who does not approve of mining the semi-precious stones and minerals that I sell could actually have a say in how my supplier's business is run causes me to shudder. I chose my supplier because they are environmentally aware and conscience of how they conduct their mining and that is of the utmost importance to me. I do not want to see their high standards compromised all because of the proposed changes to shareholder proxy votes.

Best-
