Dear Murphy-

Being part owner of a company that is overseen by a board of directors, I feel that it would be disastrous to put any corporation in the hands of an individual who is under qualified when it concerns the daily operations of the business. We are not a business where we sell a must have product, this is a seasonal business in which we sell archery equipment, so the decisions our board members make are very important to the health of this company. I am opposed to SEC changes that allow for government interference.

Changing the current shareholder proxy access rules could lead to a higher cost of the products we need to carry for our everyday business operations. We have been open since February 2004, and I am one of the founders of this business. We are established and doing quite well, and hope to continue expanding in the coming years. Being retired from the military gave me the income necessary to partake in this business venture. Without that money, I would not be able to be a part of this business, given the state of our economy.

My main concern about these rule changes is that anytime the federal government gets involved, things seem to go from bad to worse. Our area is fairly stable, but even so, people have lost their jobs and have little spendable income. I disagree with the Securities and Exchange Commission's effort to change the shareholders proxy rules. I believe that this approach could harm my business financially, and I am sure the harm would go much further than just my company.

Thank you for your service,

George Harris
