Dear Ms. Murphy,

Imposing large-scale changes to proxy access on all public companies and their shareholders is a step in the wrong direction. In these tough economic times, increasing the cost of business for expensive board elections would create results that are even more devastating than what our country is currently facing. You simply must not allow this to happen.

Five years ago, I felt the need to make my family a priority. So, I left my job in the grocery store business to open Dreamland Daycare. My company is a licensed in-home daycare facility.

For the first two years in business, I enjoyed steady growth and employed one full-time employee. Unfortunately, with the way our economy has been lately, I lost many of my clients because their parents lost their jobs. This has made it difficult for me to make ends meet. Most recently, I was forced to sell my children's swing set in order to put food on our table.

Please do not change the SEC's rule regarding shareholder proxy access. It may seem like a way to involve shareholders in corporate decisions, but it will actually create problems for large companies that will trickle down to small companies like mine. I honestly cannot afford to see this rule change take place.

Sincerely,

Ami Iriarte
