Dear Ms. Murphy,

Four years ago, I had the inspiration to begin CG Care, LLC. The idea is that all businesses- large or small- need customer care, and much of this work can be done via telecommute and from my own home. It has been difficult to get off the ground, but I still aspire to operate this business full-time in the future. Because my services depend on the productivity of other businesses, I must ask you to vote against the change in shareholder proxy access rules.

Although non-profit, I have seen the way that a board of directors affects the workings of an organization through my association with my sister's project, a shelter for battered women. In this instance, the board is not likely to have much selfish ambition because of the nature of the situation. However, if one member wanted to cause problems, it would be detrimental to the whole operation. In the business world, if a board of directors is not working together to further the interests of the business, time lost is productivity and revenue lost.

During uncertain times, we do not need to make unsteady changes. The current rules that are in place are there for a purpose. Only those with the necessary experience and common goals should be making decisions for a company. If this rule is changed and companies are left to fight battles from the inside, there will be no way to move forward and fight the overall battle against the failing economy. Businesses like my own will never get off the launching pad, and the American dream will be squelched.

Regards,

Cheryl Gregory
