Dear Ms. Murphy,

As the owner operator of a small restaurant in Jacksonville, I am concerned about the ever increasing involvement of our government in the business sector. For the past nine years, I have worked to serve my customers, produce a product that keep them coming back, provide friendly and personalized service and turn a profit. In fact, I have been able to expand my hours in the past couple of years to include breakfast, and most recently, I have begun offering a limited menu of take out family meals.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is reviewing public comments about the Stockholder Proxy Access. Let me say this, when I look forward and project for the future for my company, government is not in my vision. When dealing with my suppliers and affiliates, government is not in their vision either. Allowing a rule change that will allow easy entry to the board room of large companies by special interest activists and organized labor, will only create discontent and problems for our major corporations.

As a working man, it is my hope to someday retire. When that day arrives, I anticipate being able to depend on a reasonable income from my retirement accounts which are, at least in part, invested in American corporations. If business decisions become entanglements because new board members with outside affiliations know less about the industry and more about a private agenda, the ability to turn a profit will generate declining revenues and reduced returns on investments like my 401K. This rule change is unnecessary, and I ask that you abandon this notion.

Sincerely,

Ed Owens
