RE: Proxy Changes File #S7-03-06

Dear Ms. Morris:

I think the SEC's proposal to take the total return chart out of the proxy and have investors "find" it on the internet is unconscionable. It has been proven that anything on the internet for free is suspect. This total return data is NOT always easy to find. Finally it's a lot of time and effort to find this information that the companies should be bending over backwards to provide to the shareholders. I find it hard to imagine that you want companies to pay $69 million for "outside services" to implement your changes but want the very people you say you are trying to inform, trolling the internet and trying to match that information with what's in the proxy. My Grandmother is 85, is still sharp as a tack, has a fair sized stock portfolio, reads the proxy but couldn't find her "homepage" on the internet. What are you doing for her?

The proxy shareholder return chart is the single item of information that clearly shows shareholders what the company has produced for them financially. It is the single solitary tool shareholders have to see how management's performance stacks up against its competitors and the market. There needs to be enhancement of it if anything at all.

With Much Concern,

Gillian Crushshon
